

Profiting from Sustainability: Why Is London Outpacing New York?

Via teleconference, experts in corporate real estate and sustainability on both sides of the Atlantic will debate the similarities and differences between environmental initiatives and government regulation in New York and London, and their impact on companies' bottom lines.

Panelists:

In New York:

Peter Miscovich, managing director, Jones Lang LaSalle

For more than 20 years, Mr. Miscovich has developed and executed comprehensive workplace and real estate sustainability projects in the financial services industry and within Fortune 500 companies.

In London:

Stuart Bowman, head of energy and sustainability division, Hurleypalmerflatt

Mr. Bowman has been involved in sustainable development for more than 20 years, working for different entities including consultancies, the central government and energy services.

Moderator:

Robert Hallman, partner, Cahill Gordon & Reindel LLP

Mr. Hallman has more than 30 years of experience handling a range of domestic and international environmental law and related energy matters, including those related to compliance, complex commercial litigation, corporate transactions and a variety of energy operations.
